

Red Poles

My wife loves red because she says it represent Jesus sacrifice for our souls and the forgiveness He offers to everyone who calls on His name and acknowledges Him as their personal Lord and Savior. This is true. I am also using these Red Poles on my banners to remind us of the many abortions which have taken place in the Black communities. There have been so many lives discarded, they are too numerous to even speak. But for sure, if we would have had all those numbers in our ranks today, we would have had a better community because these things would not have been a drain on the minds and souls of our people. You couple that with the fact that the black community's population has not kept up with other aspiring groups who have come to America for a better life.

In the 50's the black population was about 11% of the total population. Hispanics were about 5% of the population, and other races were really insignificant in the nation as a whole. Today, the Hispanic population is around 20% of the population of America, the black community is still at 10-11%.

Biblically, the best way to come out of slavery is to have babies. It seems ironic but the more people you have in a free society, the better you are and quicker your people advance in a free society. In the past we had people who rose to the top and became great inventors, had business communities, great educators, entrepreneurs, motivated people who had a moral/Christian undergirding. You contrast that with our people today, and you can mark the time where our people began to decline into an abyss.
